Welcome to today's discussion on media criticism and journalism theory.

[0:15]

Host: Today we're joined by Jay Rosen to discuss the current state of journalism.

[0:30]

Jay Rosen: Thank you for having me. I think we're at a critical juncture in journalism history.

[0:45]

The traditional gatekeeping model is breaking down, and we're seeing new forms of public engagement.

[1:10]

Host: Can you elaborate on what you mean by the gatekeeping model?

[1:15]

Jay Rosen: Certainly. For decades, journalists decided what was newsworthy and how stories should be framed.

[1:30]

But now, with social media and direct communication channels, that dynamic has fundamentally changed.

[1:45]

The audience has become more active in shaping the news agenda.

[2:00]

Host: What are the implications of this shift for journalism education?

[2:05]

Jay Rosen: We need to rethink how we train journalists. They need to understand audience engagement differently.

[2:20]

It's not just about producing content anymore - it's about facilitating democratic discourse.

[2:35]

The role of the journalist is evolving from gatekeeper to community facilitator.
